Prenatal Breastfeeding Prep Guide

Setting the Foundation for a Beautiful Nursing Journey

The Golden Hour The first 60 minutes after birth are crucial. Skin-to-skin contact regulates your baby's temperature, heart rate, and breathing while triggering your natural milk-making hormones. Request uninterrupted skin-to-skin time immediately after delivery, if medically safe.

Understanding Colostrum Your first milk, colostrum, is thick, yellowish, and packed with antibodies. Your baby's stomach is only the size of a cherry on day one, so they only need about 1-1.5 teaspoons of colostrum per feeding. Frequent, small feedings are normal and necessary.

Your Essential Preparation Checklist

- Comfort: A supportive nursing pillow (like the Boppy) and a comfortable chair.
- Care: Organic botanical nipple balm and washable nursing pads.
- Hydration: A large, easy-to-open water bottle. Breastfeeding requires extra fluids!

When to Seek Help Breastfeeding is natural, but it is also a learned skill for both you and your baby. If you experience severe pain, if your baby is not producing wet diapers, or if you feel overwhelmed, do not wait. Book an Initial In-Home Lactation Consultation so we can support you early on.
